The Latin American Studies Program at the University of Miami has a record of over thirty years of innovative interdisciplinary research, teaching, and public programming. Over the past several years, however, the program has experienced discontinuity in leadership and declining enrollments. Given our geographic advantage, the large number of affiliated faculty with dynamic research portfolios in Latin America and the Caribbean, and our interested and engaged student body, UM should be able to position itself as a regional leader in the field. To help to realize this goal, the Latin American Studies Steering Committee invites all interested faculty, staff, and students to take part in a roundtable discussion hosted by UMIA.
